Business Lunches

The Times Book Review

Taking Advantage of Business Lunch Time

Perhaps the best time to kill two birds with one stone is when having a meal with a potential client or a colleague. How can you take advantage of getting the most out of these occasions? This question is addressed by Angela Jameson, CEO and founder of Jameson Ltd., a Manhattan-based consulting group for business development strategies. She says it is important to be efficient in establishing your objectives. Make sure you plan them well. Here is what you should do the next time you have that business lunch.

1. You should really prepare what you want to get out of the meeting.
2. You might prepare some introductions or 'ice breakers' that will make it easier to begin a conversation.
3. You should be ready to follow up with an appointment, so have your agenda with you.
4. Using search engines look up all the latest on your lunch guest and the sector of activity you will be discussing.
